On Good Morning America, Fields said his message mostly revolves around just how safe he believes it is to play football instead of going back to the outside world.

"My main message I would like to get across to the Big Ten Commissioner is just that we want to play football, and I feel like a lot of players feel safer around the facility and around our protocols rather than just being on campus like a regular student," Fields said. "For example, our safety protocol is we get tested twice a week and around the facility everyone wears masks and stuff like that, so I think a lot of players feel more safe around the facility rather than just being out in the community without being tested twice a week."

Fields was also asked what he would say to students and student-athletes who are not taking COVID-19 as seriously as he is. To that, Fields said that it comes down to thinking about the effects it could have on others, as well as yourself.

"Just think of other people rather than yourself. I think it's kind of selfish just to think about yourself," Fields said. "I would just tell them to think about other people and, although the virus may not affect you that seriously, I think it can affect others seriously."

On why he wants to play when he is likely a top pick in the 2021 NFL Draft regardless, Field said it comes down to both safety and his passion for football.

“Me, it’s really just for the love of the game,” Fields said. “My love for Ohio State and my love for my coaches and my teammates, and again really just the safety reasons, I feel like there’s a lot of people on our team that feel safer in the facilities so I would say just having us playing football in the facility daily, I think that will keep us safe from the virus.”

Finally, Strahan asked Fields if the junior quarterback would participate in a Spring football season that the Big Ten is attempting to create after postponing all fall sports in 2021.

Fields said he is unsure currently if he would play or opt out to enter the draft, but that he is not thinking too far ahead because of how fast news can change.

“Right now I’m just taking it day by day. I think one thing that I’ve learned over this whole process is that things can change daily, so right now I’m just taking each day at a time,” Fields said. “I haven’t really thought about that, but hopefully I’ll come up with a decision if that happens, and just pray about it really.”
