

Ohio State Tweaks Interior Of OL With ‘Super Versatile’ Branden Bowen At LG

COLUMBUS, Ohio — Less than 20 minutes from Saturday’s noon start at Ohio Stadium, pregame warmups for Ohio State’s spring game drew an interesting wrinkle.

When the first-team offense broke from its huddle and spread out five linemen, the newest look in the trenches featured a veteran at a new spot.

While the Buckeyes worked through 14 practices of spring camp without a 2018 starter and a pair of 2019 arrivals, fifth-year senior Branden Bowen filled the void at left guard in the scrimmage finale.

According to Myers, the latest move in OSU’s musical chairs along the offensive line was a rather recent installation.

“At left guard, not long this spring,” Myers said. “But Bowen is one of those guys, he’s so smart and knows so much about the offense that he can bump anywhere on the offensive line — it really doesn’t matter — and that’s honestly a huge help. His versatility has been a huge help for us this spring. He’s been all over the place.”

Without junior left tackle Thayer Munford (lower back) for all of spring camp, head coach Ryan Day and offensive line coach Greg Studrawa bounced Bowen between both tackle spots.

The 6-7, 315-pounder was Ohio State’s right guard as a sophomore in 2017 — before he broke his left leg during the Buckeyes’ sixth game of the season — and returned to the original interior position throughout spring camp.

Left guard, however, appeared to have Cupp entrenched until Rutgers graduate transfer Jonah Jackson and Buford, Ga., five-star center Harry Miller arrive in June for summer enrollment.

“(Bowen) is so versatile,” Davis said. “He can play any position. The only position I’ve never seen him play is center.”

“I think that the offensive line — we have four guys to replace there,” Day said. “And so that’s something that is probably the least experienced. ... Thayer didn’t play in the spring, so how’s that all going to look when we get into the preseason? We do have some guys coming in which is good — the calvary coming — which is important.”

In the meantime, Bowen at left guard holds Ohio State’s first-team offensive line over until Jackson and Miller step foot on campus for good.
